Come gather around the warmth of the space heater, take a seat in a lawn chair, and allow me to recount a daring tale of adventure, struggle, and the long journey back home from London.

This all began with my unexpected enlistment in the English Expedition Force, prompted by a questionable bar tab of just ten pounds shared with my new acquaintance, a French

-Canadian lad by the name of Seine LaGone.

I found myself in what could easily be described as an ordinary working-class pub, a setting that turned out to be my first misstep.

I was attempting to earn a few coins by sketching portraits of the local women when a rather imposing and impatient policeman, known as a Bobby, confronted me about my lack of a street vendor's license.

My second error was trying to explain, albeit unsuccessfully, that I was seated inside the pub and not peddling on the street.
Unfortunately, my legal reasoning fell on deaf ears, and had it not been for Seine, who discreetly whispered something to the officer—possibly a suggestion that my father was the American Ambassador—I might have faced a summons for street vending without a permit.

The officer glanced at Seine, who nodded in response, prompting the policeman to step out of the pub.

I turned to my new companion and suggested we share a drink, both of us believing we were taking advantage of the pub's enticing "buy one, get one free" promotion.

However, as the night wore on, the bartender presented us with a bill that contradicted the advertised offer, igniting a heated dispute.

This commotion caught the attention of the same officer, who returned after learning that the American Ambassador had no son.

Before I knew it, we found ourselves staring through the bars of the local police station's drunk tank, the night having spiraled out of control.

To my surprise, we had barely been there an hour when we were led into a makeshift courtroom and introduced to the district's night judge.

At first, he seemed like a congenial individual, especially for someone in his position.

However, my initial impression quickly shifted as he began outlining the serious allegations against us, which included impersonating a diplomat, operating without the necessary business permit, and, most notably, our outstanding bar tab.

The judge, rubbing his forehead thoughtfully, warned us that if we were found guilty, we might find ourselves aging behind the bars of an English prison for many years.

He paused for a moment, glancing at a quiet man seated at the back of the courtroom, before adding that there was an alternative.

He urged us to consider volunteering for the English Expeditionary Force, emphasizing the noble cause of defending democracy against the ruthless German forces.

In a moment of intense clarity amidst life's challenges, we exchanged a knowing nod, prompting the quiet gentleman to step forward and guide us to the nearby recruiting station.

The following morning, he accompanied us to the ferry, reassuring us that we would undergo proper training before being deployed to the front lines in the trenches of Northern France.

As we embarked on our journey to join the English Army, Seine's words resonated deeply, filling us with a sense of purpose and determination that we had been scammed and shanghaied.

We felt deceived and forcibly conscripted for a mission that seemed unjust, especially since Seine was Canadian and I was an American.

I made it loudly clear that America was not at war with anyone, yet the ferry continued its course to France, ignoring our desperate cries for freedom.

In the autumn of 1915, London was the backdrop to this life-altering experience, and all that remains of that tumultuous time are the sketches I diligently crafted just days before chaos erupted. It's gratifying to realize that even the most long forgotten creations can be resurrected to help cover my rent this month.

I hope you find joy in these works.
